With no intention of causing a scene, I reached over and grabbed a handful of sand. It was cool and powdery, and I just had to get a feel for it. On impulse, I spread my fingers, and felt the sand between my nails, and got a real sense of the texture. My dad was a rationalist, and he taught me a lot about what was possible and what wasn't. But I was always an irreverent, skeptical person. And on some level, I always knew he was right. He never really said, "Look, you know, this is what it is," so I never took him very seriously. But now he's on his deathbed, and the capacity to be rational is all I have left. This person that I used to look at with contempt because he was so convinced of his way of seeing the world is the same person who was right. Now I have to admit to myself that he was right all along. My dad was really a genius, and he was also absolutely nuts. He had this crazy radar for what was wrong with the world, and he was a real optimist, even though he had a hard time reconciling the two. When he was really sick, I finally realized I had some choices, and I realized that the person who was speaking up for me was this guy. His rationalism was an idea, but his sanity was a person. It was this person that I had this admiration for. He was being a good person, and he cared about the world, and I realized that he had a right to do that. He had a right to be right, and he was. Keegan told her dad she would "never forgive him," and left. But Dad told Keegan he was going to make his mind up. Then he died.
