Surgical management of periprosthetic joint infection of the hip and knee. The incidence of infection associated with total joint arthroplasty in the United States is reported to be as high as 1.4% to 6.2%. Patients with infection of the knee or hip joint pose a difficult problem, as they present with symptoms and signs of an acute problem and an insidious infection that progresses through an insidious course over months and years. Treatment options include antibiotics alone, antibiotics and arthrodesis, and arthroplasty. The most common infections are Staphylococcus aureus and Staphylococcus epidermidis. The treatment options for infected total hip or knee arthroplasty include thorough wound preparation, debridement of nonviable tissues, and antibiotics, and ultimately total arthroplasty or arthrodesis. Infection at arthroplasty sites is a devastating complication that requires meticulous treatment by the orthopedic surgeon. The influence of somatosensory stimulation during walking on balance control and accuracy in the haptic and visual modalities. To test the hypothesis that somatosensory stimulation during walking enhances the cognitive control of balance and accuracy in the haptic and visual modalities, we compared the effects of tactile stimulation (TS) and visual feedback (VF) to those of only VF on the balance and accuracy of walking. We recruited 12 healthy participants and divided them into three groups: group VF (n = 4), group VF + TS (n = 4), and group TS (n = 4). All participants performed the walking tasks in normal and single-leg stance on a treadmill. In the normal walking task, the two legs were stimulated during the stance phase only. In the single-leg stance task, the stimulation was applied only in the stance phase of the ipsilateral limb. The walking speed, stride length, double support time, and standard deviation of the center of pressure of the ipsilateral limb in the anteroposterior direction were used as parameters. The accuracy of walking in the single-leg
