Dating and mating, by nature, is a fairly messy affair, so much so that if we looked at it through a properly modern lens (and we know, there is no such thing), we'd probably see it as taking place in a digital vacuum. But if you're an aging human, you spend a lot of your time staring into a television screen, and modern society makes it so you only have to click your mouse once a day. Of course, when you're talking about a mass-market product, that's not how the problem is solved. You simply buy a TV that happens to have that option baked in, and you can buy a "What's on TV" guide so you don't have to turn it on every night to find out what's on TV. It seems like a small thing, but to a mass-market product, that's a surprisingly high-level thing. Anyway, despite the fact that dating and mating in this day and age is typically a higher-level game than, say, dating and mating in the wild, people do the whole thing a lot like you would expect. The guide to online dating A very modern conception of dating and mating (well, maybe not modern, but definitely tailored to the modern lifestyle) is "online dating", and while the Internet can take you a lot further than the 4Chan lurkers at The O'Reilly Factor Magazine, it also makes it a lot harder to find something that you're actually looking for. If you're interested in finding someone to date, you can essentially select any of the profiles on your dating site and hit "Send". And chances are, that "Send" button is going to be a lot like that "Send" button in your email. You click it and you hit the "Send" button. That's it. Well, that's it if you're using any other site than eHarmony, which has some specific buttons that are designed to make dating with them more fun. Another problem with online dating is that you get to see everyone. If you're a picky person, it's really easy to hit "Report Abuse" on 2d92ce491b
