The majority of fuel injectors presently in use in conventional auto engines are of two major types; namely, unit injectors and piezoelectric or solid state. In the case of unit injectors the fuel injection timing is controlled by timed injector pulses which are coupled with the engine cam shaft. In the case of piezoelectric injectors the fuel injection timing is controlled by energizing or deenergizing a piezoelectric actuator which changes the time of injection. Both of these types of fuel injectors are controlled by a cam shaft of the engine. The fuel injector is either fired in response to the engine cam shaft for the engine timing when the engine is running or is triggered in response to the engine cam shaft for starting the engine. It is apparent that for an engine in which the
