Governor Andrew Cuomo signed the law in 1998 and it was billed as a blow against the state's chronic racial disparities and added support for John Carlisle, a state legislator who called for a ban on all standardized testing and on community-police relations. In January 2000, the city's first black police commissioner was appointed by Mayor Rudy Giuliani. Commissioner Bill Bratton, a former NYPD chief, staked his strategy on asserting the authority of the police, undercutting the community's faith in the department and turning the police department into a dominant force in the city. By the end of 2000, with the support of Giuliani, Bratton declared the NYPD a "zero tolerance" police department. The motto is now "zero tolerance of lies," and the NYPD began embracing the police state. A 2014 analysis of the NYPD found that blacks and Latinos experienced the fifth most stops and searches. The cases often involved claims of loitering. While loitering is a vague and ambiguous offense, searches and arrests for loitering are rampant throughout the city, often leading to arrests of people for civil-rights violations, if not more serious charges. I liked it very much, though it's more difficult than you might think. I do mean that it is not a simple story to tell, and that this was one of the main reasons that the prizes committee decided to award the prize. However, I do think that the book will become very popular and that it is the kind of thing that everybody should read. "I'm not even sure what the tale is about. And I know it's about something, because something has happened. But what?"—Hilary Mantel, Why Be Happy When You Could Be Normal?
