Q: JSX element that has no children I want to create a JSX element that represents the following: but only if there are no children. This is the code I use to check if there are any children: But it doesn't seem right because in this case the className of the element will be changed to some-class even if there are children. Is there an easy way to do that? Thanks! A: To answer the second part of your question as to how to do this as a concise way, use the conditional operator, like this: A: To expand on the answer from @Doug, there is a condition function that you can use.)?'some-class':'some-other-class'} /> A: You can't just add JSX elements without children. You have to add a return. becomes . Deliberate Identify-Threat-And-Take actions to protect you. If a threat is identified, take protective actions. Administrative Actions are used to prevent the incident from occurring again, including removal of the affected user and/or accounts, educational awareness, and/or administrative controls such as server removals and mandatory patches. Do-not-Fix actions are used to correct an error of the type found or prevent recurrence of the problem. Mitigation or Recovery Actions are used to re-establish the proper working state of systems. Further Discussion An Incident Response Plan (IRP) is a written document that defines the incident response process. The IRP will state who will be involved in the process, how they will be contacted, what kind of actions may be initiated, how the plan will evolve over time and what will happen to the original IRP after the incident is successfully handled. The IRP should also specify the objectives of the action, which will help to determine which actions may be acceptable or required. Examples of situations
