To date, biosensors represent a very promising tool for clinical use, owing to the rapid development of nanotechnology and biotechnology, or their combination, including the advance of biomaterials and the enhancement of detection methods. The applications of biosensors include the detection of molecular targets, in vitro diagnostics, medical point-of-care (POC) testing, and in vivo diagnostics. This chapter presents the concept of biosensing and focuses on nanomaterials, both as signal transducers and as structural elements, for sensing applications. The chapter focuses on the main parts used to integrate the nanomaterials into biosensing chips: the nanomaterials and their functionalization, integration into chip configurations, the applications of nanomaterials in biosensing, and the mechanisms of signal detection. The chapter concludes with potential future challenges of biosensing and nanotechnology in the field of disease diagnosis. Three methods to assess the accuracy of gait analysis of stroke patients in the clinic. The quantification of gait at the bedside is essential in clinical assessment. Three methods of gait analysis were compared. The systems were tested for static and dynamic accuracy by tracking known landmarks. The precision of gait analysis for dynamic features (walking endurance) was measured with a sit-to-stand test. Clinical assessments were performed by physical therapists in a stroke unit and gait analyses were made in the same patients. A consistent improvement of clinical scores in all subjects was observed between the first and second assessments. The consistent improvement in clinical scores between the two sessions indicates that the assessment of gait analysis for clinical purposes was accurate. All gait analysis systems had a static accuracy below 100 mm. In 5 subjects, the sit-to-stand test was inaccurate. The use of a sensorized walkway rather than a straight walkway and the use of a computerized step counter improved the dynamic accuracy to below 100 mm.
