A network of coupled nonlinear delay differential equations is analyzed by using a standard Lyapunov function technique and a novel theorem about linear matrix inequalities (LMIs). The main conditions required by the proposed analysis are the Lipschitz continuity and the negative sign property of the perturbed system. Based on the analysis, a novel type of synchronization conditions for the general network is established. Some special cases, such as uniform coupling strength, uniform coupling phase, uniform coupling delay, asymmetric uniform coupling strength and asymmetric uniform coupling phase, are studied. The effectiveness of the proposed analysis is illustrated by an example and shown to be well matched by simulation. Electrophysiological assessment of cognitive performance in clinical practice. The organization of human learning and memory often provides a sequence of typical EEG patterns for recording, including the "readiness potential," the "orienting response," the "sensory response," the "orienting response-early memory" sequence, the "recognition response," and the "memory" sequence. These are typically recorded by the subject performing or watching a relatively simple, well-defined mental task.
