Tablets are the best interfaces for computers, for obvious reasons. With one in your hands and another sitting in the same room, it's easy to pick up the one you need, and the ones you don't need don't usually sit close enough to interrupt you. The same principles can be applied to file browsing and management. Modern tablets can be stacked or staggered to create an elaborate layout, and different tablets can even communicate via Bluetooth to produce a unified interface. That's the theory anyway, and a lot of PCs use it to display an array of folders to one side and a list of files on the other.
