Moving beyond the current paradigm of electronic data storage and retrieval, memories that change shape based on environmental conditions would be very desirable. One way to achieve this is through the use of our recently-launched, optical bendable metamaterials. These metamaterials consist of an array of preferentially curved, rod-like structures that, when activated by a laser, can exhibit remarkable changes in the way that the array bends when exposed to various environmental conditions such as moisture, pressure, temperature, etc. As described in [1], these metamaterials can be tuned to be either optical superabsorbent (super_abs) or optical uptight (super_uplift). Super_abs memory results from the difference in optical properties of the coated vs uncoated specimen. When the metamaterial is coated with dielectric material, it bends away from the light source and becomes very, very dark. The uncoated specimen bends towards the light source and becomes bright, revealing the original bending behavior. Super_uplift memory results from the difference in optical properties of the coated vs uncoated specimen. When the metamaterial is coated with dielectric material, it bends towards the light source, becoming very bright. Uncoated specimens, on the other hand, bend away from the light source and become very, very dark. It is important to note that these metamaterials are not perfect black or white. To be truly black, the d0c515b9f4
