The importance of understanding speech perception in the school setting is becoming increasingly evident. Research evidence points to cognitive processing deficits in many children. Determining the validity of certain tests employed in school settings is necessary. The purpose of this study was to investigate the validity of currently used measures of auditory processing in the school setting. Participants included students aged 7 through 15. Two components of a T-test battery, the Listening in Spaced Sentence Test and the Cowan's Sentence Discrimination Test, were administered to third- and fifth-grade students and their scores were compared to scores on a test of auditory processing using four different measures: a gap in noise test, the Penke Sentence Identification (PSI) test, the Sentence-in-Noise test, and the Sentence-in-Noise test with expanded recognition. There was no significant difference between fifth-grade and third-grade students on the Listening in Spaced Sentence Test and only a marginal difference between these two grades on the Cowan's Sentence Discrimination Test. Only the performance on the Listening in Spaced Sentence Test was significantly correlated with the performance on the four other tests of auditory processing. These data suggest that the Listening in Spaced Sentence Test is superior to other measures of auditory processing in the school setting.
