CD4+ T-cell function and viral burden in HCV-mono-infected patients taking interferon. T-cell function was measured in patients infected with hepatitis C virus (HCV) with well-defined virological and histological features. The effects of interferon (IFN) therapy on CD4+ T-cell function were assessed in patients receiving no therapy and in patients treated with IFN alone and in combination with ribavirin. Significantly reduced T-cell responses were seen in all patients with HCV before therapy in the absence of liver disease. The functional responses of CD4+ T cells were poorly correlated with CD4+ T-cell counts or the cytokines interleukin-2 or interferon-gamma produced in response to stimulation with an HCV epitope. IFN therapy improved the proliferative response and IL-2 production of the CD4+ T cells of the responding patients. Moreover, the IFN-induced increases in proliferation and IL-2 production were associated with a decrease in HCV RNA in the serum and the associated decrease in serum transaminases. These findings suggest that a defect in cellular immunity may contribute to the pathogenesis of HCV-induced liver damage and that restoration of T-cell function by IFN therapy may be an important therapeutic mechanism of action in patients with HCV. Kiev THIS month the world awoke to startling images of civilians being fired upon in Ukraine and of many small arms being pointed at peace-keepers. Images of this conflict have been all too graphic. The scale of the problem is easily grasped: the death toll has already exceeded 17,000, according to a recent United Nations estimate, and the loss of life is expected to rise by 10,000 a week. NATO has been here before. It vowed to protect its members' interests and to use force if necessary; but at the same time it has failed to persuade most countries that Russia's involvement in the conflict in Ukraine is more than a clash of imperial interests. The question, then, is what Russia has in mind. Russia denies arming the rebels or sending fighters to fight on their behalf, but says it is prepared to intervene to protect its own interests. A Russian military intervention would put a further strain on relations between the West and Russia, and create further trouble for Ukraine. Before the crisis started, Western powers were trying to persuade Ukraine to sign an Association Agreement with the European Union. The deal, which was negotiated in 2013 by President Viktor Yanukovich, a Russian-speaking former president, was never ratified. Yanukovich was overthrown in February 2014, just before Russia's annexation of Crimea and a separatist uprising in the east of the country. As Russia's relations with Europe deteriorated, Moscow appeared to want to destabilise Ukraine. For years Moscow has been quietly exploiting the numerous Russian-speaking minorities in Ukraine to spread Russian-language propaganda. Some of that propaganda has been cleverly disguised as populist rhetoric but in reality it is about appealing to the grievances of those groups. The people's republics are a reminder of the Soviet Union The appeal is partly sentimental and ideological, and partly about the desire to safeguard Russian speakers from the risk of losing their language and being identified with Ukraine. There is plenty of evidence that it is still possible for the people to rebuff the message. In 2015 there was a record number of unauthorised Russian-language passports issued in Ukraine. Donetsk, a stronghold of support for the rebels in eastern Ukraine, had more than 150,000 second-language Ukrainians at the time. The separatists' steely belief in their cause was only reinforced by their association with Russia. It was Russia's decision to support an economic blockade of Crimea that fed the current crisis. The strategically valuable Black Sea peninsula was the site of a
