[The problem of diagnosing and evaluating the efficiency of radiotherapy of the uterine cervix based on the study of changes in the activity of the hypothalamic-pituitary-ovarian system]. Examination of the ovarian, androgenic, estrogenic and progesteron hormonal status was performed as part of complex study of 80 patients with cervical cancer. The analysis of hormonal data showed that patients with a low hormonal activity (with a low concentration of progesteron and weak stimulation of gonadotropin) were in a comparatively severe condition and their life prognosis was poorer than in those with a high hormonal activity. A combination of examinations of hormones of the hypothalamic-pituitary-gonadal system was shown to be the most informative one for prognosis of the patients with cervical cancer who underwent therapeutic-androgenic alkylation. Individuals with alcoholic psychopathy (AP) manifest extreme psychiatric dysfunction that appears to be genetically transmitted and has an extreme influence on their behavior and outcome. Previous research has demonstrated an association between AP and poor performance on tests that require the ability to learn in serial associations. Using a test of serial association learning, we found that AP subjects demonstrated a normal ability to learn serial associations but were impaired in discriminating among different orderings. Serial association learning was also significantly correlated with the level of alcohol abuse/dependence. These data suggest that the serial association learning task may be a simple test of a deficit in one of the general areas thought to be associated with AP (executive functions). Considered in light of previous research, these data suggest that excessive alcohol use may have a causal relationship with some of the behavioral problems associated with AP.
